Rationale

For my sitemap I brainstormed everything that I knew I wanted to show off my skillset from the things I have already. Seeing as how I just finished my first year of college I do not have many projects or works from college to display in my portfolio. I then arranged them in what I thought was a good manner, trying to show as much detail as possible. I also used Word Publishing Layout for my full sitemap, because Google's application Diagramly kept giving me trouble.

Then for my wireframe I looked at a couple of different portfolios and figured out things I liked and didn't like. One person had their navigation in the footer, which bothered me because normally that's where you put unimportant information. When I initially looked at their page I had to look around to find the navigation. That is how I learned I didn't like that setup. I also learned that I like having the landing being the biography page, so I made mine that way as well.
